MONEY MATTERS:

Money and race are two unspoken facets of American society, and we're trained from a young age not to talk about either of them. One piece of our work this summer is understanding how money creates barriers and what we can do to overcome these barriers.

The Sub/Urban Justice Program charges no tuition or fees. Why? Because we want to make it as accessible as possible for every young person who applies. However, the program costs us about $1,800 per participant to operate – for transportation, facilities rental, class supplies, staff salaries and other overhead. With that, we ask each and every family to make a voluntary contribution based on family income. Please take a moment to consider what you can pledge, and know that it will support this powerful, challenging and fun learning experience for your child and all the young people in the Sub/Urban Justice Program.

Finally, we will not let cost be a barrier! We have a number of options for families facing financial constraints in these tough times. Please contact us about scholarships, fundraising support, cost-sharing, and in-kind donations. Money can be an uncomfortable topic, but it should not be a barrier.
